

Day, S. (2015). UN Human Rights Committee blasts Canada on gender wage gap. The Canadian Human Rights Reporter. <https://www.cdn-hr-reporter.ca/content/un-human-rights-committee-blasts-canada-gender-wage-gap>

The senior editor of Canadian Human Rights Reporter who is also an avid human rights activist starts her article with an issue on Canadian's gender pay gap, almost twice in comparison to the global average from a feminist perspective. She first supports her argument by indicating that the UN Human Rights Committee needs to claim the neglect of the Canadian delegation in gender wage gap in order to terminate the wage inequality in Canada: exclusion of females' housework in calculation. By contrasting the UK where its government requires companies to make their pay rates of both genders visible to the public, she claims that Canada also needs the strategy. Referring to the UN Human rights committee's suggestions to narrow the wage gap, she conclusively suggests that Canadian provincial governments such as SK, NL, and BC set up proper pay equity policies in both public and private sectors to eradicate the discriminatory barriers for female workers. The comparative statistics between in Canada and the UK are useful for my research paper as its background.

[Note]: Because this article is pretty short, this annotation has less than 200 words. However, as your sources have reasonable length for you to write annotations, please stick to 200 words if possible.